Saturday, August 18, 2015 "We have a lot to learn from the bush," says Charles Bryan, a University of Northern Colorado professor of aerospace engineering. With the explosion of information collected on our computers, how do you find the right information to help you make a decision? A tiny, wireless, brain-controlled robotic vehicle could help us identify the best information, says Bryan. This autonomous vehicle is controlled entirely from the brain, making it extremely responsive to information gathered by the visual and auditory senses. It does not require any input from the user or the external environment to perform its intended functions. The vehicle is controlled by a robotic engineer who can send it into the world without him or her. This robot needs only to see what the world around it looks like and detect whether it is touching its environment. So how do you navigate a huge forest or city, without getting lost? The vehicle uses information gathered by sensors on its body to orient itself. These sensors detect whether the vehicle is walking, running, falling, standing still or being pushed or pulled by an external force. This allows the vehicle to perform its functions effectively, whether it be picking up a tomato in the garden or helping patients navigate an unfamiliar environment. Scientists are using the robotic vehicle in various applications. Bryan is testing it as a reconnaissance vehicle in a forest that is accessible only by ATV. The vehicle is also being used to study how people navigate an unfamiliar environment, such as a new neighborhood or university campus, while learning how the brain recognizes and processes information gathered by the senses. These tests will enable the team to find out whether there are any physical or mental impairments in people who navigate the world without assistance. "The vehicle provides an alternative that allows people with disabilities and those in remote locations to navigate," says Bryan. A group of researchers at the University of Illinois at Urbana-Champaign and the University of Illinois at Chicago are using the vehicle to learn about how people with disabilities navigate through their daily lives, such as navigating the home and school environments. Researchers are also using the vehicle in
