The predecessor to Luigi's Mansion, Dino Crisis, had an unlockable ghost buster that was a drill. Splatterhouse had a minigame where players had to kill each other with knives. And Rayman stole its name from the slide-whistle used in Rub-a-Dub-Dub 2. The point is that videogame designers sometimes have the tendency to reframe the medium's own history as if it is some kind of development roadmap. Developers are presented with new ideas and, in the case of an open beta, they will often
